The endpoints are simply some string properties of the LogEventMessage that I want to log to some clients on the remote network. Now, usually I would just create a NLog target, and configure that target to log to a file. From what I have read, NLog has the ability to mimic a file target using memory or SQL, but I can't find any documentation on how to configure it. I can configure a RemoteTarget or an SQLTarget, but how would I go about getting this combination of target to log to the network? What would that target code look like? A: You can create a custom target that does just what you need. Take a look at the source code for WebTarget. I had a couple ideas on how to implement your log, but I don't like either of them. Log to a file, and move it to an SQL database each time an item is logged Use MemoryTarget and a WriteTo.Memory buffer. Both are not the easiest to set up, and are pretty error prone. Q: How to ensure that the peak of "shake" occurs when the ball stops shaking? I'm making a graphical simulator that allows a user to move a ball, using shaking as a control. However, there is always a problem that the peak of shake occurs when the ball is f678ea9f9e
